These Measures will Help Kansas Children

By Christie Appelhanz, Executive Director, Children’s Alliance of KS

You measure, what matters, as the saying goes. But when it comes to Kansas’ juvenile justice reform efforts, we’re using the wrong yardstick. Until we consider the whole picture, we’ll never address what really matters: improving the lives of Kansas children. It is encouraging that the Juvenile Justice Oversight Committee found that juvenile incarceration rates are down under reform. But as the committee acknowledged, it did not consider what happens to children.

Program Helps Young Offenders Dress for Success upon Release

On a rainy Friday morning, Mia Hidalgo took her first steps free in 193 days. “It broke my heart,” Mia’s mother Annette said through tears. “You never want to be away from your child or have them in that environment. But they may make mistakes, and you just got to love them through it.” Mia says bad decisions landed her in this type of environment, but they make mistakes, and you just got to love them through it.

Human Trafficking Awareness Month – Kansas

AG Derek Schmidt: January is Human Trafficking Awareness Month in Kansas

Kansas Attorney General Derek Schmidt is launching a radio public service announcement (PSA) in January in conjunction with Human Traffick Awareness Month. “Human trafficking is a crime of exploitation that thrives in the shadows or, sometimes, hides in plain sight,” Schmidt said. “Continuing to raise awareness and providing a collaborative approach to identifying trafficking and to knowing how to respond is a key to combating it.”

For many of us, January and a new year marks an opportunity to make and set new goals, get started at something we may have been thinking about doing, targeting an area to make improvements in or to identify something specific we can do to improve our quality of life. With significant steps being taken over the last few years to make improvements in the Kansas juvenile justice system, more remains to be done. That being said, there are several areas to highlight to bring you up to date.

The Crossover Youth Practice Model state policy team held their first meeting, with representatives across multiple fields and disciplines. Staff from Georgetown University’s Center for Juvenile Justice Reform were on site to lead the team through the day, discussing the model and evidence supporting the model, as well as definitions of crossover youth and Kansas data. As this work progresses, we will provide updates.

During the 2019 legislative session, House Substitute for Senate Bill 23 was passed and signed by the Governor. It required DCF to “study the effect of 2016 Senate Bill No. 367 on crossover youth or children specifically youthful at risk of being placed in foster care due in whole or in part to conduct that has resulted or could result in juvenile offender allegations, and youth placed in foster care engaged in continued next page . . . .

The benefits of the Parent Project® are well documented and include improving school attendance and performance and providing a behavior model that effectively addresses the critical issues parents face today while offering special, step-by-step, solutions, not just theories. It is need-based, easy to teach, and is an evidence-based curriculum built on cooperative learning principles.

Participants will learn about the Parent Project® and how to present the curriculum back in their home community. The Parent Project® is designed to provide parents with guidance, skills and techniques to manage children and youth that may be more challenging and difficult. Issues such as arguing, family conflict, school attendance and poor school performance, teenage sexuality and drug use, runaways, bed-wetting, bullying and dealing with gang activity will be addressed.

During the first two sessions offered this past August and September, there were 94 professionals in attendance certified as instructors. Among those in attendance were staff from court services, community corrections, juvenile detention and juvenile correctional facilities, juvenile intake and assessment, juvenile justice program/management, immediate intervention, high school involvement, mental health, child welfare and other community based organizations. Comments received at the conclusion of the facilitator training included:

"The training had a lot of really useful information and is definitely a needed resource. A lot of programming is geared towards the youth – if you want changes in the youth you need to help them first."

"We have some programs that help with basic family skills, but this program offers specifics for this is what you do if your kid is in a gang, or uses drugs."

"Very useful and easy information to present."

"Before I came I was told it was the best training you'll ever attend and they were right."

"You've got this program so much and it helps me want to teach it. I love helping people and cannot wait to start teaching this course."

"This is one of the best conferences I have been to. All communities need parenting programs, have been looking for a (parent) piece to the puzzle."

"This will be used for families of runaways with children in foster care. Gave me confidence in dealing with these families through therapy."

Jordan Schneider, a Family Engagement Officer with NWK Juvenile Services became a certified facilitator in September and recently completed a Parent Project® cohort with five parents of teenagers. Schneider stated "I helped facilitate this class and absolutely loved the program to do the work at my home and work site. I just try to watch these small changes take place not only with the kids, but with the moms as well as they found this confidence and love for teaching again. As one mom said on the last day, "at the end of 10 weeks you all here don't just feel like friends to me but like my family." This is what happens when parents are intimately vulnerable about their struggles and accept change in their lives, true progress occurs."

Heather Murphy with the 22nd J.D. became a certified facilitator in August and recently completed a Parent Project® cohort stating "one thing I have really noticed is that it gives them permission to parent their children. It empowers them to take charge of the situation."

Teresa Harkins, a Court Services Officer in Wyandotte County was the first to become a certified facilitator in August stated "the program was restorative for parents. The curriculum is structured in such a way that the parents / caregivers become accountable and restore the peace in their home or relationships. If neat to see that level of ownership and empowerment from a group that is walking in feeling already somewhat defeated.”

According to Ralph "Bud" Fry, Parent Project® President and presenter “Nationally, 96% of the parents who complete the course would recommend the class to a friend. That is a big number considering that roughly half are court ordered to attend. The classes are successful because the Parent Project® was built from the input of over 500,000 parent questions and comments. A parent’s success can be linked directly to the heart and skills of the facilitator’s teaching the class."

Ending PUSHTOUT Act, Girls in Secure Detention, and Gender-Based Violence

The Ending PUSHTOUT Act introduced by Representative Ayana Pressley and co-sponsored by Representative Ilhan Omar, seeks to address the punitive and exclusionary school discipline policies that disproportionately affect girls and young women of color, and funneling them into the criminal justice system. The bill would establish $2.5 billion in new federal grants to states and schools. Read more . . . .

I Was in Juvenile Detention, So I Know that Locking up Kids Doesn’t Work

Two years ago this week, former Gov. Chris Christie announced the closure of two of New Jersey’s youth prisons. Two years later, they remain open. Based on my personal experience, this is unacceptable. I was what they call a dual-system kid. In the world of youth justice, that means I spent time in both a youth detention center and foster care.
